Reflect on Emotions

Change is a really big deal in my life. Sometimes it feels exciting, like the first day at a new school. The hallways are bright, there are new people everywhere, and it feels like anything could happen. My heart beats fast, but in a good way, like it's saying, "Go for it!"

Other times, change honestly scares me. It feels like walking into a dark room and not knowing where anything is. My stomach hurts, and I start thinking, "What if this goes wrong? What if I don't fit in? What if I miss how things used to be?"

Most of the time, I feel both excited and scared at the same time. I have hope that things could get better, but I also feel worried about losing what I already know and feel comfortable with. It's like standing at the top of a tall slide—part of me wants to go down, and part of me wants to climb back down the ladder.

I'm trying to learn not to run away from change. I tell myself to take a deep breath and take one small step forward. I might say, "I'm nervous, but I'm also ready to see what happens." Change still makes me worried, but it also makes me wonder what new things I might learn and who I might become.
